BREED THEATER.

The Girl and the Sheriff, the Feature Picture.

Seidom is one given the unusual privilege of seeing life in the mountains of Tennessee exactly as it is, but such is the case with the spiendid feature picture at the Breed today, for it is strikingly dramatic in the tenseness of its exciting situations and the pressure of its moments of suggested dangers and results and the pressure. of its moments of suggested dangers and results which are happily etuded. A young mountain maid is resting in her home when a young mountainear bursts suddenly into the room, announcing that he has been shot by the sheriff who is pursuing him. She hastilly dresses his wounds and conceals him in the closet. The sheriff enters and with feigned hospitality the girl gives the sheriff several drinks of whiskey. Meanwhile she borrows his revolver to crack some nuts for him and secretly removes the cartridges. She entertains him further by playing upon the banjo, but he becomes very upon the banjo, but he becomes very free and attempts to embrace her when the infuriated young mountaineer when the infuriated young mountaineer breaks the closet door and defends his raviour. The sheriff draws his revolver and, finding it emptied, knows he is powerless. The girl tells the youth to escape as quickly as possible. He saks her to go with him. She consents and together they make a hasty exit from the cabin, leaving the infuriated sheriff helpless and alone. They lose no time and make the best of the opportunity to place a safe distance between themselves and the graddened sheriff.

This picture is one of the series of

tance between themselves and the maddened sheriff.

POVERTY ROW.

'Tis a group of old dwellings outside of the town,

Straggling and shaky, unpainted and brown;
Cutworm remains of a time long ago,
And called in derision "The poverty row."

A record the thoughtful may read as they go,
The "sins of the fathers" here glaringly show;
The sons of the erring, the dull, and the slow.
Perforce must oft house them in Poverty Row.

A dolorous song for the lips or the bow;
Tet virtue oft blossoms as pure as the snow
Within the drear confines of Poverty Row.

And children here shout as they run to and fro.

Brimming with mischief they play and they grow;
The heirs of the shovel, the saw, and the hos.
Go forth to their struggles from Pov-erty Row.

Poverty Row! Poverty Row!
Laugh at it! Scoff at its want, and its woe!
Who knows but a martyr may heavene
ward go
From out the long penance of Poverty
Row!
—George W., Priest, in National Monthly.
